Rising food prices is among the most broadly felt indicators of inflationary pressures in the United States. The new rise is blamed on widespread worker shortages, surging transportation costs and supply chain issues, among other factors.

According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, grocery prices rose an average of 3.5% over the last year.

The soaring prices are "putting additional difficulties on families, because all of a sudden, they can't buy as much as they could before". Food banks nationally feel that this will affect their mission to feed families!

Latest News

Several holiday food drives were ran by Solve Hunger state liaisons in Missouri, Oklahoma, and volunteers in Illinois. The food collected from these food drives replenished the shelves of several local food pantries.

Check out the full list of pantries near you in the preferences tab of the Solve Hunger app under "My Food Bank Locations".
